

ENGLISH SUMMARY

Forword.....	9
--------------	---

INTERNATIONAL LAW

Michel VILLEY, Untimely considerations on jus gentium	13
--	----

What today seems more desirable than an interstate law, is a universal private law. The model does exist. It is the jus gentium, as defined in the Roman Digest.

Joe VERHOEVEN, International public law, international private law : where is the difference ?.....	23
---	----

Even if a widely held doctrine lends to international private law necessary roots in international public law, the former exists «on the side» of the latter, in an environment where state sovereignty rules. The federalist model which «internationalises» international private law does not fully take into account the real world where protecting the person is the main care.

Serge SUR, International juridical system and utopia.....	35
---	----

Like other juridical systems, international law has three dimensions : one for recording – which accounts for power relations and makes them official –; one for organizing that contains institutions, mechanisms and procedures of the system; one of utopia which includes all the representations and goals of the system and informs it. But whereas these dimensions are coherent in internal systems, with international law they remain independant, not to say contradictory. Here the utopic dimension is especially noticeable and easy to identify. Its various functions – negation, assertion, anticipation, transfer, derivation – can then be analysed.

Peter HAGGENMACHER, War and peace Law by Grotius.....	47
---	----

Rather than having made up international law from start to finish, Grotius wrote the ultimate synthesis of the currents of thought composing the doctrine of the just war which he turned into a general theory for settling with weapons the arguments staying away from judicial ways instituted between citizens by public powers.

Simone GOYARD-FABRE, Hobbes and Rousseau' silences toward international law 59

In Hobbes political philosophy, which is political in the narrow sens of the word, the power of the Leviathan-State does not cross frontiers. Hobbes is reacting to the current civil war that brought England back into the anarchy of the state of nature and therefore thinks that peace merges with Commonwealth security and order.

Rousseau is more qualified and wonders about the existential meaning of a would be international law. He discovers an antinomy between the citizen linked to the State, and man open to the universe, he therefore concludes, with a certain sadness, that national law will always hinder international law.

Horatia MUIRR-WATT, Natural law and State sovereignty in Vattel's doctrine 71

Unlike a still widely held opinion, Vattel is not the one to be blamed for the decline of natural law as a foundation for jus gentium. He only made more specific a doctrine already in embryo in his predecessors of the School of nature and international law.

Jean-Michel BESNIER, International law by Kant and Hegel 85

With Kant and Hegel, international law answers the question of war through modalities of paradoxical consequences. A survey of the Project for perpetual peace and of the Principles of law philosophy shows that the relation between the thesis of criticism and that of system, keeps a number of surprises, however softened by the position explicitly assigned to international law by each philosopher.

Philippe RAYNAUD, War and law : Limits of rationalisation. Max Weber and his posterity 101

The XXth century was marked at the same time by the desire to submit war to law and by the worsening of violence in military conflicts. Max Weber's, Carl Schmitt's and Raymond Aron's merit was to show the solidarity of these processes by referring both of them to the contradictory development of modern rationality. Their divergences bear on the meaning to be given nowadays to the ideals of modern rationalism.

Paul REUTER, The operational and normative aspects of treaties 111

An international treaty being at the same time formal and normative, contains provisions which are essentially constituting the deed and must be distinguished from normative provisions. Moreover to the system of treaties as a whole, belong some characteristics linked to its normative aspect but others, more numerous, can be explained by its formal aspect.

SUMMARY

439

DUPUY, The individual and international law. Theory of human rights and foundation of international law 119

Has the international assertion of the fundamental rights of the human being, accomplished through treaties on the basis of the general provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, already altered, even very slightly, the foundations of law and the structures of legal international order ?

Jean SALMON, Legal construction of facts in international law 135

Unlike what is often maintained, when legal reasoning takes the form of the syllogism, a fact is not simply contained in the minor. It rules over every step of the reasoning with the evaluative interpretation given to it. Legal reasoning does not rest on a separation of fact and law, but on a dialectical movement between them.

Monique CHEMILLIER-GENDREAU, Origin and role of fiction in international public law 153

After having clarified what can be called a fiction, as opposed to other categories, and after recalling the main doctrinal currents as far as fiction is concerned, this study takes for basis a conception of the norm as a power relation accepted between the parties. But law uses ideological means, presented as juridical techniques to force acceptance of these situations. Fiction appears to be one of them.

Denis ALLAND, Space representations in international public law 163

Space is at the center of interstate relations and international law. Its profound heterogeneity appears in its legal treatment: space is quantitatively and qualitatively diversified, it carries changing values and meanings. From the point of view of spatial politics or from the point of view of theoretical rule analysis, this study reveals a dissociation between real space and juridical space. The main fact to be kept in mind is not so much this very dissociation as the modalities according to which it proves revealing of the tensions to which contemporary law is subject as a whole.

Bruno OPPETIT, General principles of international private law 179

The fact that arbitral ou judiciary judges use general principles sanctions the positive value of this process as a way of creating international private Law and might foreshadow the recognition of a judicial order with a universal value.

- Stephane RIALS, The power of State and the law in international order. Elements for a critic of the usual notion of « external sovereignty » 189

The author, a constitutionalist and not an internationalist, goes deeper, on the occasion of this year topic, into a reflexion he began in Archives last issue. He runs the trial of the notion of State sovereignty which hides the necessary foundation in law of the State and the fact that the State is subject to a law that towers above it. With this - important - reservation, he admits the necessary character of a formal definition of the power of State. But according to him, if it is necessary, it is not enough. Even if the State may not be the « perfect » society dreamt by classical thinking, it remains the biggest society in which a person can bloom. Its power warrants both of them. In its unity, superstate law - a notion which covers notions seldom brought side by side due to the separation between disciplines (supra-constitutionality for internists and jus cogens for internationalists, for example) could only, while limiting it and founding its self-limitation, ensure the non-availability of the means for State conservation and power. Determining the content of this last notion is still difficult, despite an age-old reflexion on the subject. Unlike the dominating conception, such a way of thinking brings a material definition of international law.

- Jean-Marc FERRY, World debt and international justice 219

The insolvency of numerous indebted countries is equivalent to a de facto redistribution of world revenue. Currently, general international law offers no legitimation for this. For, turning back to the principle of liberal state, it does not account for the redistributive principle of social state. If world order were to convert to the principles of social state, it would have two advantages: supporting world global demand by other means than accumulating the debt - economic advantage - and make acceptable, i.e. « legitimate » what can today only be seen as a « savage » redistribution of world revenue - political advantage. However such a conversion arises the problem of a conflict between sovereignty of States and solidarity of Nations. This conflict between principles sends back to the opposition between the concurring legitimations of a « natural order » (liberal state) and « managed order » (social state). Legitimizing a « concerted order », as device overriding this opposition, would on a conceptual plane, open the perspective of a conciliation of both principles.

- Janine CHANTEUR, Law of God, law of men and peace 235

If the respect of law ensures peace inside political communities, could an international law guarantee it between States? This study intends to show that, far from being the secularization of obeying in the biblical order, the idea of peace through law, proceeds from a wrongful analogy between law and science, as developed from the XVIIth century.

SUMMARY

441

MISCELLANOUS STUDIES

- Gunther TEUBNER, Social order through regulatory noise 249

The author discusses the recent «regulatory crisis» of law in terms of closure and openness of autopoietic social systems. He compares traditional concepts of social autonomy with the new concept of social autopoiesis in the background of a radical system closure, and develops a notion of system interference which allows for the design of regulatory strategies of «reflexive law».

- Georges KALINOWSKI, About norms and their logic. Remarks around Is and Ought by Georg Henrick von Wright 277

Taking his inspiration in Kant, von Wright corrects Anderson and contradicts Searle. In the process, he explains his theory of norms and his philosophy of law which, both of them, bear the strong mark of Kelsen while underlying the deontic logic of von Wright, close in certain respects to Mally's Logik des Willens. What to think about it?

- Ingrid DWARS, Rationality of practical discourse according to Robert Alexy... 291

Can juridical argumentation be rational, and if so, what is the meaning of this rationality? These are the main questions raised by Robert Alexy. On one side, they concern the legitimacy of juridical decision, on the other, the possibility for a science of Law.

- Paul AMSELEK, Juridical deed in Charles Eisenmann thought 305

The author points out the important progress Charles Eisenmann originated in french juridical dogmatic by his analysis, inspired by Kelsen, of the juridical deed - deed enacting a norm or normating deed. He then proceeds to further this effort of elucidation by underlining the riders that must be brought to these analysis and, in particular, by highlighting that juridical deeds not only correspond to the act of enacting a norm but also to the act of «declaring» which controls the interplay of norms enacted elsewhere.

- Sophie DÉMARE, The value of the law in cuneiform laws 335

The laws of ancien Near East, even if they were not designated as such by a specific word, had a normative value. Observing the great number of formal peculiarities of cuneiform law does not prove they were ineffective, but only reveals a legal thought tinged with empirism and a very down-to-earth vision of law.

SUMMARY

Hendrik Ph. WISSERT HOOFT, A right to self-disposal ? Law and moral in front of technological challenge 347

From a reflexion on certain contemporary data, the authors intends to draw a basic critic of the « right to self-disposal ».

Diogo LEITE DE CAMPOS, Pleading for man : indemnification of death harm 353

After defining a few basic categories (personality, life, right to the respect of life), the author intends to justify the principle of indemnifying death harm, in particular by disproving the idea that the de cujus could not acquire a right linked to the very disappearing of his legal personality.

TEXT

Miguel REALE, The tridimensional theory of law 369

INTERNATIONAL CHRONICLES

Germany, Valentin PETEV 389
 Canada, Guy LAFRANCE 391
 U.S.A., Carl WELLMAN 392
 Spain, Angel SANCHEZ DE LA TORRE 397
 Italy, Franco TODESCAN 400

REPORTS 405